Crop biofortification for food security in developing countries – volume II

Crop biofortification is a promising strategy for addressing the issue of food security, especially in developing countries. It involves enhancing the nutritional content of crops by breeding or biotechnological methods to increase the levels of essential vitamins and minerals in the edible parts of the plant. Moreover, the interventions in agronomic practices can also contribute to combating malnutrition and related health issues in populations that rely heavily on staple crops with limited nutritional value. Malnutrition is a significant problem in many developing countries, where people often rely on a limited range of staple crops, such as rice, wheat, maize, and cassava. These crops are calorie-rich but often lack essential micronutrients like iron, zinc, vitamin A, and folic acid. Crop biofortification focuses on increasing the levels of specific nutrients in these staple crops. For example, biofortified rice can be developed with higher levels of vitamin A, while biofortified beans can be bred to be richer in iron and zinc. These biofortified crops offer a cost-effective and sustainable solution to nutrient deficiencies. Biofortified crops can contribute to sustainable agriculture by reducing the need for costly and environmentally damaging nutrient supplementation and fortification programs. Promoting biofortified crops often requires addressing cultural and social factors, therefore a continuous effort is needed to educate the people about the benefits of these crops and encouraged to accept them as part of their regular diet. Addressing food security through crop biofortification requires collaboration between governments, agricultural institutions, non-governmental organizations, and the private sector. Investment in research, development, and scaling up production is essential.

Therefore, two volumes of the Research Topic “Insights in Crop Biofortification for Food Security in Developing Countries” collated recent information from various sectors to develop coherent pool of information for policy makers as well as scientists. The second volume of this very important Research Topic highlighted the latest advancements in crop biofortification and how it can influence food security in developing countries.

Five papers were published in this Research Topic. In the first paper “The resurrection of sweet corn inbred SC11-2 using marker aided breeding for β -carotene” by Saba et al., the favorable allele of cr1RS1 (responsible for high β -carotene) from a donor was introgressed into a recurrent sweet corn inbred to develop β -carotene-rich
