Records, Computers, and the Rights of Citizens United States. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Secretary's Advisory Committee on Automated Personal Data Systems, 1973 In a Foreword to this book Elliot Richardson writes that It is increasingly necessary for people to have information about themselves collected stored and used by organizations maintaining computer based record keeping systems As a worker as a student as a patient as a taxpayer as a bank depositor as the owner or driver of a car as a welfare recipient as one ticketed for even a minor parking violation it is practically impossible to avoid becoming the subject of a record However so long as man as an individual in families in larger groups and in society is not a purely rational creature so long as American society prizes the individuality and the humane qualities of man and his associations and so long as we continue to celebrate some uncertainty and mystery in our lives we must learn to temper this particular technological application with sensitive concern for due process and the average citizen's wish to be let alone It was with these considerations in mind that Richardson then HEW Secretary established an advisory committee on automated personal data systems It consisted of 27 participants and included social service professionals managers from the private sector public sector administrators elected officials academics lawyers and private citizens It was asked to study and make recommendations about Harmful consequences that may result from using automated personal data systems Safeguards that might protect against potentially harmful consequences Measures that might afford redress for any harmful consequences Policy and practice relating to the issuance and use of Social Security numbers This book represents the Committee's report to the Secretary and to the nation It compiles and analyzes the data that have been collected on its subject scales the historic legal and social dimensions of the question and judiciously sorts out the inherent conflicts between society's or an organization's legitimate need to know and the individual's right to privacy One of the basic conclusions reached is that Under current law a person's privacy is poorly protected against arbitrary or abusive record keeping practices Accordingly the report recommends the enactment of a Federal Code of Fair Information Practice enforceable against all automated personal data systems governmental and private The Code would be designed in such a way that it would guard against specific abuses and yet be sufficiently flexible to encompass unforeseen developments in computer technology In particular the report examines the implications of a standard universal identifier and opposes the establishment of such an identification scheme at this time After reviewing the drift toward using the Social Security number as a de facto all purpose personal identifier the Committee recommends steps to curtail that drift Records, Computers, and the Rights of Citizens United States.
