ABSTRACT

Considerable evidence exists regarding the role housing plays in the determination of health and well-being outcomes. Despite the scale of health concerns arising from housing considerations, there are very few economic analyses of housing programs that seek to improve health outcomes by addressing the physical infrastructure of the living environment. The NSW Housing for Health (1891) program is an environmental health initiative funded and administered by NSW Health, that addresses health-related hardware in residential accommodation to ensure the home environment supports healthy living practices to ultimately improve health outcomes for residents. This study reviews the economic methods that have been applied to comparable programs and identifies relevant costs and benefits that should be addressed. Founded on the requirement from decision makers, and the insights from the review, the paper outlines a protocol for a cost-benefit analysis that accounts for the disparate health, social, economic and intangible benefits generated from the 1891 program and the resources utilised to realise these outcomes.

1. Background and objectives

Social determinants, such as access to clean water and sanitation, food, health and social services, income levels, employment, education, transport and housing, have long been acknowledged for their role in health and well-being [1–3]. Significant evidence exists regarding the role housing specifically plays in the determination of health and well-being outcomes [3–7].

Australia's Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander population has suffered from long-term disadvantage. In response, various Governments have undertaken program and policy initiatives to close the gap between Australia's Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and non-Aboriginal population in terms of health, education, economic development, justice, families and young people, culture and heritage, and housing [8,9]. One initiative seeking to reduce this inequality is the Housing for Health program.

The broad purpose of this paper is to review the literature to determine the most appropriate method for economic analysis of the New South Wales (NSW) Housing for Health program.
