

Still Opting for the Poor: The Brazilian Catholic Church and the National Movement of the Street Population

MADELEINE COUSINEAU

Have rumors of the demise of liberation theology been greatly exaggerated? There is a prevailing belief among scholars and other observers that the Latin American Catholic Church has withdrawn from the preferential option for the poor, which had encouraged a combination of faith and activism for social justice. This article challenges that belief by means of qualitative data gathered during 8 months in Brazil that provide evidence of close connections between the Pastoral of the Street, a church program that mobilizes homeless people, and the National Movement of the Street Population (MNPR). The principal data came from 42 interviews with homeless or formerly homeless people, movement leaders, and religious sisters and lay workers in the pastoral program. Participant observation and documentary research supplemented the interviews. The findings demonstrate that the Pastoral of the Street helped to create the MNPR and continues to provide it with material and ideological support.

Keywords: Brazil, Catholic Church, Latin America, liberation theology, preferential option for the poor, social movements.

INTRODUCTION

Is the Roman Catholic Church still a force for social change in Latin America? Or has liberation theology died, as some writers assert (Leffel 2017; Simonetti 2018)? This article addresses these questions by presenting the results of a qualitative study of religion and social activism that shows where the influence of liberation theology persists today. It demonstrates how the Pastoral of the Street, a church program organized by religious sisters in Brazil to empower homeless people, led to the development of a non-religious social movement, the National Movement of the Street Population, known as the MNPR (Movimento Nacional da População de Rua). Although the MNPR is structurally autonomous from any religious organization, the pastoral continues to support the movement and its goals. These goals include mobilizing people at the grassroots level in order to build solidarity among them and helping them to advocate for social policies for ending homelessness, as well as for human rights, social services, and employment opportunities.

This study utilizes the case of the Brazilian Pastoral of the Street to support the argument that religion continues to be a stimulus for social activism. The findings were gathered during an 8-month study of this pastoral program, which began 33 years ago in the city of Belo Horizonte,

Funding for this research was provided by Jack Shaud Grants from the Society for the Scientific Study of Religion and a Joseph H. Fichter Grant (for gathering data on the role of religious sisters in organizing the Pastoral of the Street) from the Association for the Sociology of Religion.
