PIPAC Marc A. Reymond,Wiebke Solass,2014-10-14 Peritoneal dissemination is a common route of cancer metastasis The benefit of administering chemotherapy directly into the peritoneal cavity is supported by preclinical and pharmacokinetic data In comparison to intravenous IV treatment intraperitoneal IP administration results in a several fold increase in drug concentration within the abdominal cavity There is now growing evidence from clinical studies showing a survival advantage for IP chemotherapy in various tumor types including ovarian gastric and colorectal cancer However while the use of IP chemotherapy is slowly gaining acceptance it is not universal largely due to the greater toxicity associated with this approach Moreover efficacy of IP chemotherapy is limited by poor distribution within the abdominal cavity and by poor tissue penetration A new way of IP chemotherapy is the application of cytotoxics in form of a pressurized aerosol into the abdominal of thoracic cavity Pressurized intraperitoneal aerosol chemotherapy PIPAC is applied through laparoscopic access using two balloon trocars in an operating room equipped with laminar air flow In a first step a normothermic capnoperitoneum is established with a pressure of 12 mmHg A cytotoxic solution about 10% of a normal systemic dose is nebulized with a micropump into the abdominal cavity and maintained for 30 min The aerosol is then removed through a closed suction system Applying an aerosol in the peritoneal cavity allows a homogeneous distribution of the chemotherapeutic agent within the abdomen Furthermore an artificial pressure gradient is generated that overcomes tumoral interstitial fluid pressure an obstacle in cancer therapy This results in a higher local drug concentration compared to conventional IP or IV chemotherapy At the same time the plasma concentration of the chemotherapeutic agent remains low In first clinical studies with limited number of patients in ovarian gastric and colorectal cancer as well as peritoneal mesothelioma PIPAC has obtained encouraging tumor response rates and survival with a low side effects profile Larger clinical trials are currently ongoing to examine if these data can be reproduced and extrapolated to other situations
