

The effect of mindfulness-based interventions on elite athlete mental health

A Systematic Review And Meta-analysis

- Meta-analysis including 12 randomised controlled trials (RCTs)
- Investigated the effect of mindfulness-based programmes (MBPs) on mental health
- The first systematic review and meta-analysis to focus on mental health outcomes exclusively in elite athletes, evaluating randomised controlled trials only

Main findings

- Mindfulness training significantly reduced symptoms of anxiety, stress, psychological distress, and increased psychological wellbeing.
- There was a large but non-significant effect size associated with mindfulness training reducing symptoms of depression.

Effect Of Mindfulness On Mental Health

Key messages

A range of mindfulness practices improved mental health, from pre-recorded exercises completed alone at home, to intensive in-person group sessions delivered by experienced mindfulness teachers.

The most effective method appeared to be high-fidelity programmes that were adapted specifically for sport. Mindfulness-based programmes may also be particularly effective for older athletes, especially retired elite athletes.

Mindfulness has been used widely in sport to improve athletic performance. We found that both competition anxiety and general symptoms of anxiety were alleviated by mindfulness practice, suggesting mindfulness can improve mental health and performance together.
