

Basic notions from probability theory

Probability theory is the mathematics of chance and luck. To elaborate, its goal is to make sense of the following question:

What is the probability of a given outcome from some set of possible outcomes?

For example, in the snow-fall analysis of the previous chapter, I computed the rank-sums for the two halves of the data set and found that they differed by 16. I then wondered what the probability was for such rank-sums to differ by more than 16 if the rankings were randomly selected instead of given by the data. We shall eventually learn what it means to be “randomly selected” and how to compute such probabilities. However, this comes somewhat further into the course.

2.1 Talking the talk

Unfortunately for the rest of us, probability theory has its own somewhat arcane language. What follows is a list of the most significant terms. Treat this aspect of the course as you would any other language course. In any event, there are not so many terms, and you will soon find that you don’t have to look back at your notes to remember what they mean.

Sample space: A sample space is the set of all possible outcomes of the particular “experiment” of interest. For example, in the rank-sum analysis of the snowfall data from the previous chapter, I should consider the sample space to be the set of all collections of 16 distinct integers from the collection  $\{1, \dots, 112\}$ .

For a second example, imagine flipping a coin three times and recording the possible outcomes of the three flips. In this case, the sample space is

$$S = \{TTT, TTB, TBT, BTT, TBB, BTB, BBT, BBB\}. \quad (2.1)$$

Here is a third example: If you are considering the possible birthdates of a person drawn at random, the sample space consists of the days of the year, from the integers from 1 to 366. If you are considering the possible birthdates of two people selected at random, the sample space consists of all pairs of the form  $(j, k)$  where  $j$  and  $k$  are integers from 1 to 366. If you are considering the possible birthdates of three people selected at random, the sample space consists of all triples of the form  $(j, k, m)$  where  $j$ ,  $k$  and  $m$  are integers from 1 to 366.

My fourth example comes from medicine: Suppose that you are a polliwogician and you take the pulse rate of a 1-year-old child? What is the sample space? I imagine that the number of beats per minute can be any number between 0 and some maximum, say 300.

To elaborate: The sample space is no more nor less than the collection of all possible outcomes for your experiment.
