Under the United States Constitution and in many state constitutions, the magistrate is the officer to whom a person must be brought to review the arrest, seek probable cause, set bail (if any), determine whether a warrant shall be issued to have the accused arrested and whether the accused's home may be searched. In this comprehensive manual, the author presents a positive picture of the interaction between the police officer and the committing magistrate. With the use of his topical indexing, extensive table of cases and series of contemporary case decisions, the police officer, magistrate and interested citizen will be able to make immediate decisions in many complex situations.
