

following a stressor while another does not; understanding this difference requires an awareness of the underlying vulnerability (for example, genetic predisposition) and the meaning of the stressor for the individual. The biopsychosocial approach to understanding and treating individuals with mental health problems and mental disorder flows from this aetiological model (see Chapter 3).

GPs are uniquely placed to work in the biopsychosocial paradigm. The GP generally knows the patient, their family and often much about their social network. All too often family and carers report that their knowledge of the patient has not been sought by health providers. This is a lost opportunity, as they are usually a rich source of information that enables a greater understanding of an individual's vulnerability to illness. Often the GP has observed the patient, and those around them, negotiate life stages and developmental tasks, and is aware of any difficulties or traumas that the patient may have experienced. Thus, the GP can readily identify situations where present-day problems resemble old traumas, and so understand the meaning of what may objectively be minor stressors.

GPs are also well placed to observe and understand the effects of an individual's illness on those around them. This enables the GP to provide or ensure the family has access to information and support. Furthermore, family and carers usually play a key role in a patient's recovery. The GP can readily facilitate and support this (see Chapter 5).

GPs deal with a broad spectrum of mental health problems. These will include normal responses to stress or trauma—for example, death of a loved one or difficulty coping with a diagnosis of a medical illness—that nevertheless may require assistance to prevent the development of a disorder and/or a functional impairment. GPs also see patients with a range of milder mental health problems, sometimes labelled 'sub-threshold' disorders. These frequently require short-term focused interventions to facilitate recovery. Finally, GPs are called upon to assess and manage patients with a range of mental illnesses, sometimes alone and sometimes in collaboration with specialist colleagues (see Chapter 22).

It is generally accepted that patients seen by GPs have a range of problems, 'comorbidity is the rule' and GPs are required to fill a number of roles simultaneously. For example, treating a patient's medical problems, then detecting and managing a depressive illness and attending to their adolescent daughter's drug abuse will require careful management of GP roles. Sometimes, the GP will need to inform the patient about aspects of their role, including any special limitations.

DIAGNOSIS AND CLASSIFICATION IN PSYCHIATRY

The term 'mental disease' was first used in the early years of the nineteenth century, emphasising the view that mental illnesses were diseases of the brain. While the territory of psychiatry is still described as mental illness or mental disorder, these terms now include a much broader range of conditions assumed to result from the complex interplay of biological, psychological and social factors. A commonly accepted definition of mental disorder thus reflects this inclusive approach to:

A clinically significant behavioural or psychological syndrome or pattern that occurs in an individual and that is associated with present distress (e.g. a painful syndrome) or
