1. THE DARPA SPEECH AND NL WORKSHOPS

This volume presents revised versions of papers presented at the Fifth DARPA Speech and Natural Language Workshop, held in February 1992 at the Arden House Conference Center in Harriman, NY. This series of workshops provides a forum where researchers can exchange information about very recent technical progress in an informal, highly interactive setting. Topics of interest include speech recognition, speech understanding, text understanding, and machine translation.

The majority of the participants receive funding under DARPA's Spoken Language or Written Language programs, which are the focus of the workshops. Other participants include researchers not funded by DARPA who voluntarily participate in these programs or in related benchmark evaluations; government researchers and consumers of these research results; and, on a rotating basis, selected visitors from both inside and outside the US. The participants in this ongoing series of workshops form a tightly-coupled research community in which results and research breakthroughs are typically evaluated, disseminated, and exploited with very short latency.

Aspects of these meetings include: technical presentations of both new research results and the ongoing evolutionary development of large software systems, often months before this research is reported elsewhere; the presentation of results of a variety of carefully standardized system evaluations; discussion of the future direction of the various DARPA programs in light of recent progress; and much discussion of ongoing work between individual researchers.

To facilitate the timeliness of the work presented at Arden House, abstracts were due less than two months before the workshop, with accepted papers due less than two weeks before the workshop. A looseleaf proceedings was distributed at the workshop itself, with these revised versions submitted a month after.

2. THE 1992 WORKSHOP

For a sense of the workshop as a whole, the reader is encouraged to first read the overview which precedes the collected papers from each of the sessions. These overviews not only summarize the key points in each set of papers, but also serve to give a perspective on the larger research areas in which this work is done.

Technical highlights of the 1992 Workshop include (a) the continuing steep slope of improvement of spoken language systems working within the Air Travel Information System (ATIS) domain, (b) the clear payoff of very large coordinated inter-site data collection efforts, (c) beginning steps towards very large vocabulary speech recognition systems, and (d) the continuing explosion of research results in statistical natural language processing.

Over the past five years, error rates for benchmark speech recognition tasks have dropped by a factor of two to three every year. This year was no exception, with the best system word error rates for ATIS demonstration systems down to about 6% on reserved test material taken from spontaneously recorded natural speech, some with disfluencies.

The centrality of data to the efforts of this research community was underscored by the efforts of the many sites of the Multi-Site Data Collection Working group (also known as MADCOW). This group was able to collect over 10,000 utterances with transcriptions within the ATIS domain as of the February workshop. The training and test sets for the ATIS benchmarks came from this corpus.

Going well beyond the limits of the ATIS task, this year's workshop saw preliminary results from the first of a new generation of very large vocabulary speech recognition systems, trained and tested on read material taken from the Wall Street Journal. As a first, preliminary effort, the vocabulary for this initial test was limited to 5000 words. Again, the data was collected by a coordinated effort involving multiple sites.
