1. Introduction

For a software development environment to handle a large, complex software project effectively, the environment must have mechanisms for source code control and configuration management. A common method of addressing this problem uses a source code control system such as SCCS [3] or RCS [4] as a baseline. Configuration management is superimposed upon the low level version control system by describing a system variant as a selection thread through the sets of component versions. The DOMAIN Software Engineering Environment (DSEE) [2] is an example of just such a system.

In the GANDALF project, we are exploring the inverse approach by building version control on top of configuration management. The composition of variants of a system occurs at the lowest level. Each variant characterizes an instance of a complete system, such as a system variant to run under the X windowing system vs. a system variant to run under the NeWS windowing system. This approach emphasizes the composition of systems as opposed to assembling system variants out of components organized with a version control system at the lowest level.

The next higher level provides version control. This level maintains the evolution of the system as a set of revisions. As development proceeds, modifications of software components are tracked by the creation of additional revisions. Each revision contains a full set of variants in contrast to systems such as DSEE, which maintain revisions of single components.

At the top level, we embed version control in a nested long-term transaction model to handle the issues of active software development by multiple users. This mechanism defines a recursive structure which provides encapsulated workspaces for software development and the ability to divide the development process into subtasks. All levels of the transaction hierarchy include the capabilities of the versioning system, providing the developer with a safe environment for experimental work.

In the following sections, we will further characterize each of the three levels used to manage a software system in a GANDALF environment.

2. Variants

At the lowest level in our model we maintain a hierarchically structured collection of source code components. This structured collection consists of one or more variants of a software system. Each variant represents a complete instance of the software system and is comprised of a subset of the components in the collection.

For example, Figure 2-1 shows a collection of components 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. There are two system variants within this collection, specified by "Win = <X10,X11>" and "Win = <NeWS>". which distinguish the target windowing system. The system variant for X10/X11 consists of components 1, 2, 3, and 4, while the system variant for NeWS consists of components 1, 2, 3, and 5. As this figure demonstrates, the structuring of components within a collection allows us to specify sharing (1, 2, and 3) and discrimination (4 or 5) of components among system variants.
