Abstract

This study investigates differences and similarities in coping responses to peer victimization and the way culture is reflected in the social cognitions adolescents used in choosing their coping responses through a mixed-method design with 731 Taiwanese and 470 U.S. adolescents. Adolescents provided coping responses to peer victimization via both hypothetical situations and within structured open-ended questions. Two culturally distinctive psychological frameworks, seeking connection in Taiwan and showing independence in the United States, were reflected in both the coping responses that adolescents endorsed (i.e., more seeking adults' support in Taiwan and more problem-solving coping in the United States) and the social cognitions used in the coping process (e.g., connection seeking in Taiwan and self-independence demonstration in the United States). Taiwan and U.S. adolescents also differ in the prevalence of coping strategies in the real-life peer victimization descriptions in a way that was comparable with our quantitative findings (i.e., more seeking friends and adults' support in Taiwan and more solving the problem on one's own in the United States).

Keywords

cross-cultural study, peer victimization, coping strategy, adolescent

The cultural diversity of adolescents and the globalization of contemporary life make it crucial to understand cultural contributions to adolescent development. Nowadays, a worldwide population of adolescents faces social difficulties such as peer victimization on a daily basis (Smith & Brain, 2000). Understanding the ways adolescents cope with these peer difficulties and the reasons behind their coping choices will aid researchers in identifying effective interventions and preventions in different cultural contexts.

Coping Strategies in a Cross-Cultural Context

Coping strategies are culturally shaped behaviors (Lam & Zane, 2004). This renders culture a crucial factor associated with an individual's coping pattern because individuals may be expected to adopt coping strategies that are more common and appropriate within their cultural context (Marsella
