

The Place of Physical Geography in the Core units

Phiwarr – look at that arête.....

A quick survey of people in the street reveals that for many their most poignant memories of physical geography are ones of extreme lakes, corries and standing in a cold stream.

This core unit 'An Extreme Environment' – exploring landscapes and processes – is about far more than the harshness of the Himalayas, the dryness of the deserts, the coldness of the extreme cold places. Whilst studying the landforms and processes students also consider the challenges of the extreme environments, the interaction of people with their environment and the concept of a sustainable future.

Only ONE of the three extreme environments needs to be studied, as the majority of centres the decision will have been made by teachers. However, it would also be possible to offer a choice of environments to students by using a project based learning approach to the unit.

Is this unit the only focus of physical geography in the core units? A study of the local area in 'My Place – Living in the UK Today' would not be complete without some understanding of the physical geography of the local area. For some places, the physical features may be some of the defining characteristics of the place. Changes resulting from physical processes may be the underlying cause of issues in the area, and an understanding of the processes and landforms may be key to a deeper understanding of the challenges, issues and changes.

Within the 'People as Consumers' unit, an investigation into the issues of the Coca Cola factory in Kenya, India leads to the inequities in water resources. How can the depletion of groundwater resources be fully explained without also exploring the processes associated with groundwater storage, depletion and replenishment.

Making the resource requirements for teaching the physical geography is not a candidate of a task – most GCSE textbooks provide a good resource for teaching the processes and landforms – this coupled with a creative approach – annotated models for example, enables students to demonstrate their learning in a more unusual way.

Identifying landscapes through a wide variety of media, including pictures, photographs, film, enhances students interest and awareness of physical geography. For instance, the deserts of West Run depicted in the film 'Lawrence of Arabia' and other desert scenes quickly impart a sense of the extreme heat, dryness, and lack of vegetation – taking the students' imagination beyond their personal experience.

Whilst there are three core units in the Pilot GCSE Geography on the surface appear to have a focus on the physical, human and place themes, the key components of geography are fully embedded in each of the units.

Successful learning is... sitting on a coach, having just disembarked from an aircraft at Lourdes en route to the Pyrenees and hearing a 14 year old student shout out from the back of the coach 'Phiwarr look at... (no, not the attractive young lady who just walked past...) ... the arête on that mountain'
