

Computational Learning Theory: Survey and Selected Bibliography

Dana Angluin*
Yale University

1 Goals of the field

Give a rigorous, computationally detailed and plausible account of how learning can be done. Translation:

Rigorous: theorems, please.

Computationally detailed: exhibit algorithms that learn.

Plausible: with a feasible quantity of computational resources, and with reasonable information and interaction requirements.

The alert reader notices the buzzword “reasonable” — slack for a dazzling variety of models.

1.1 Definition of learning

Not now! This also is part of the goals. So far the emphasis has been on inductive learning (from examples) of concepts (binary classifications of examples) adapting the methods of analysis of algorithms and complexity theory to evaluate the resource use of proposed learning algorithms. When the examples are random, statistical methods are also important.

1.2 General resources

Directly relevant recurrent meetings are the International Workshops on Algorithmic Learning Theory, ALT [18, 19] and the annual Workshops on Computational Learning Theory, COLT [42, 63, 110, 130]. Currently, the only textbook in the field is Natarajan's [101]. Surveys by Laird [83] and Valiant [129] are valuable.

Somewhat more peripheral are the European meetings on Analogical and Inductive Inference, AI1, and the AI machine learning community's annual International Conference on Machine Learning. In addition, the general AI meetings, AAAI and IJCAI, currently have a large number of papers devoted to learning, as do the neural net meetings.

1.3 Inductive inference

Inductive inference [16, 35, 80, 102] is to computational learning theory roughly as computability theory is to complexity and analysis of algorithms. Inductive inference and computability theory are historically and logically prior to and part of their polynomially-obsessed younger counterparts, share a body of techniques from recursion theory, and are a source of potent ideas and analogies in their respective fields. However, I must leave to others better qualified a systematic survey of recent progress in inductive inference.

2 The basic PAC model

The seminal paper is Valiant's [131]. In it, he proposed a new criterion of correctness for learning concepts from examples, emphasized the importance of polynomial time learning algorithms, and demonstrated that a classical algorithm learns  $k$ -CNF formulas with respect to the new criterion in polynomial time. He also emphasized the importance of coping with irrelevant attributes, introduced additional oracles for learning and gave learning algorithms for monotone DNF formulas and read-once formulas using these oracles, and gave cryptographic evidence that boolean circuits are unlearnable.

We now describe the components of the basic model introduced by Valiant; much of the work in the field can be understood as variations on this theme.
