

Poststructuralism and Communication

Poststructuralist writers have regularly made critiques of widespread assumptions about the nature of human communication a central part of their projects. Within the more theoretically and philosophically oriented wing of communication studies, poststructuralism has, within the past few years, been an important stimulus in reevaluations of the field. In a sense, then, communication studies and poststructuralism are already engaged in a limited dialogue. But the possibility that the two bodies of theory might "communicate" with one another more fully is made doubtful both by their relative styles of theorizing and by poststructuralism's very critique of the notion of communication. In rather different ways, both poststructuralism and communication studies tend to be antiparadigmatic bodies of theory. Poststructuralists, despite wide differences among them, often argue for the temporary, contingent, context-specific nature of theorizing. Mainstream communication specialists, on the other hand, tend to think they can operate without an explicit theory, arguing instead for a liberal diversity of methods that insulates them at once from self-reflection and political commitment. If poststructuralism pushes self-conscious reflection toward the limits of what is historically
