

OECD Environmental Performance Review Programme

Accountability Over Learning?

PLACING QUESTIONS

Journal of Studies in Environment and Development

The growing interest in evaluation as a new form of governmental governance stems from new developments and movements towards New Right, Postmodernism, and the search for new policy instruments for managing complexity, uncertainty and shifting of goals in the pursuit of sustainable development. The latter leads increasing accountability as the main purpose of evaluation while the latter stresses the importance of learning. Policy implications are often considered as mutually exclusive but recent literature has underlined their complementary roles in policy making. This article examines to what extent the OECD Environmental Performance Review (EPR) programme has succeeded in combining the objectives of learning and accountability within a single evaluation framework. The EPRs have been relatively successful in meeting the latter aim while often associated with evaluation performance improvements that have usually failed to generate direct effects. Focusing on learning accountability through social learning might contribute positively to combining the process.

KEYWORDS: accountability; environmental performance; evaluation; monitoring; peer review
