Case Description

Mr. A. A was 17 years old, male in his late teen. He was last born among six siblings and a student of first year. He reported stuttering with onset during early childhood and noticed at 5 years of age when he started schooling. His account revealed disfluent speech was frequently manifested in the form of repetition, subvocal words, glottal attack and noisy breathing. During effort to speak fluently, he experienced stretching in neck muscles, jaw opening, and hand movements to struggle with jammed articulators. He adopted the avoidance strategies to escape and prevent from stuttering such as circumlocutions, brief answers, restricted social interaction, and devoid of eye contact etc. During school in class 9th, his speech problem started bothering when he could not avoid interaction. He had to answers in the class, and recalling a lesson orally was often made him disfluent excessively. The teacher's spanking and apathy in misunderstanding him made him, felt frustrated. The speech impediments became troublesome in college. In school, his friends supported him a lot and class fellows were familiar and in the last year teachers also got an idea about his speech problem. College was unfamiliar environment with new class fellows and teachers. His one friend joined the same college and served a speaker for him. The recalled response to attendance call was anxious moment as heightened the palpitation, and leg shaking. He started refrained from class participation to avoid the laughter and mock of class fellows. He felt helpless, nervous when observed others bewildered or restless on inability to listen him clearly. Often he experienced the negative responses of listeners such as interruption and imitation of his stuttered speech. The episodes of teasing made him viewed as worthless and overwhelmed with anticipated speech failure. He was trapped in preoccupied thoughts of failure as a speaker and fixation of sabotaging thoughts about self-worth such as "I cannot be a good speaker", "I cannot achieve in life" and "I am nervous and so incapable to be considered for friendship". He was brought to the government hospital to seek the treatment for his speech anxiety that considered by family a cause of stuttering. He was referred to the researcher on his consent to volunteer for the participation in the study.

Method
