INTRODUCTION

Although dysfunction of dopaminergic (DA-ergic) neural pathways is considered a crucial component of a variety of neuropsychiatric disorders, there is no simple, quantitative, or noninvasive psychophysical measure that reflects the central nervous system's processing of the neurotransmitter. Currently, the effects of DA antagonist activity (as in the treatment of schizophrenia or Tourette syndrome using haloperidol or pimozide) or of DA agonist activity (as in the treatment of Parkinson's disease using levo-3,4-dihydroxyphenylalanine [L-DOPA]) are assessed by clinical criteria.

In this paper we present initial results utilizing a battery of specialized psychophysical tests in schizophrenic subjects receiving haloperidol therapy. These tests are designed such that they can distinguish relatively locally influenced components of retinal function and are known collectively as layer-by-layer perimetry (for review, see Enoch et al., 1981).

When these tests of retinal sensitivity were studied in a patient with Tourette syndrome, subnormal responses were seen under the influence of DA antagonist (haloperidol) and supranormal responses were seen in the absence of the drug (Enoch et al., 1987). These responses are believed to be organized in the inner (retinal) plexiform layer and in some manner reflect DA-ergic activity at this location and possibly elsewhere in the system. There is considerable evidence that dopamine is present in certain amacrine, interamacrine, and interplexiform cells in the retina in many species (e.g., see Dowling and Ehinger, 1978a,b; Dowling et al., 1980; Ehinger, 1983; Pourcho, 1982). The layer-by-layer, noninvasive perimetric techniques yield repeatable, quantitative data consistent with alterations
