Such a workflow perspective that is based on the continuity of care model provides a framework required to identify and support an interconnected trajectory of care events affecting handoff communication. To this end, we propose a new methodology, referred to as the clinician-centered approach that allows us to investigate and represent the entire clinician workflow prior to, during and, after handoff communication. This representation of clinician activities supports a comprehensive analysis of the interdependencies in the handoff process across the care continuum, as opposed to a single discrete, information sharing activity.

The clinician-centered approach is supported by multifaceted methods for data collection such as observations, shadowing of clinicians, audio recording of handoff communication, semi-structured interviews and artifact identification and collection. The analysis followed a two-stage mixed inductive-deductive method. The iterative development of clinician-centered approach was realized using a multifaceted study conducted in the Medical Intensive Care Unit (MICU) of an academic hospital. In the clinician-centered approach, we (a) identify the nature, inherent characteristics and the interdependencies between three phases of the handoff process and (b) develop a descriptive framework of handoff communication in critical care that captures the non-linear, recursive and interactive nature of collaboration and decision-making. The results reported in this paper serve as a "proof of concept" of our approach, emphasizing the importance of capturing a coordinated and uninterrupted succession of clinician information management and transfer activities in relation to patient care events.

Cashbook, L. , Moral, M. , & Shail, N. (2013). Communicating discharge instructions to patients: A survey of nurse, intern, and hospital practices. Journal of Hospital Medicine, 8(1136-41). Application to Review: Nurse-physician Communication, Informing Patients, Discharge Abstract Comprehensive discharge education can improve patient understanding and may reduce unnecessary rationalization. OBJECTIVES: To understand nurse and physician communication practices around patient discharge education. SETTING: university of California, San Francisco Medical center (SCUFFS). PARTICIPANTS:

Nurses, interns, and hospitalists caring for hospitalized medicine patients. MEASUREMENTS: Participants were surveyed regarding discharge education practices. The survey asked respondents about 13 elements of discharge education found in the literature. For each element, participants were queried regarding: 1) the provider responsible for this element of patient education; 2) the frequency with which they communicate this teaching to patients; 3) how often they directly communicate with the nurse or physician caring for the patient about each element; and 4) tools to improve nursing
