originated in Africa. They speculate, however, that the AIDS virus jumped species much more recently than the leukemia virus did, perhaps in the 1960s. The African green monkey may have been the source of both viruses. This animal carries STLV-I and STLV-III but, unlike other primates, does not get sick from them. The virus could have entered the human population when monkeys bit hunters who were attempting to capture them for food.

Is there something to be learned from the association of HTLV-III/LAV with the lentivirus family? The lessons may seem discouraging. Frequent mutations of the lentivirus that infects horses—equine infectious anemia virus—allow the virus to evade elimination by the immune system. The disease caused by the visna viruses of sheep has a long and erratic clinical course, which may include progressive paralysis or relapses and remissions. Some infected animals remain healthy but can transmit the disease to other sheep. The caprine arthritis-encephalitis virus of goats does not evoke neutralizing or protective antibodies—antibodies and virus persist in apparent harmony. Efforts to develop vaccines against these animal lentiviruses have been unsuccessful.

The positive side of the association is that past experience with the animal lentiviruses will help AIDS researchers avoid some of the less productive avenues of investigation. Also, lentivirus studies generally have not received high funding priority, in part because they appeared to have little relevance to human disease. The influx of funds occasioned by the AIDS epidemic could accelerate the maturation of existing ideas and help overcome the major stumbling blocks of the past.

Conclusion

Identification of HTLV-III/LAV as the cause of AIDS would not have been possible without the molecular biology, virology, and recombinant DNA technologies developed over the past 20 years. Laboratory analysis of the structure and function of this virus already has produced major dividends, including the development of a rapid screening test to limit the
