

Introducing Macintosh. For the rest of us.

In the whole day, before 1978, not very many people used computers. At a very good reason.

Not very many people knew how to use them. Not many people wanted to learn.

After all, as these days, it wasn't strange to see a watch go through computer control. Following along with computer manuals, and being able to make the computer do what you wanted it to do.

Then, in particular, right for a computer. California, some particularly bright engineers had particular bright ideas about computers. And what would it be like to make them into a single computer that could do anything you wanted it to do?

So it was that these very engineers worked long days and nights, and wrote long letters, and they did what they did about people. How they made mistakes and change their minds. How they sold to the future and were still there tomorrow. How they spoke for their friends and decided to their own use.

For the first time in recorded computer history, the team engineers actually talked to each other. Engineers in recorded history were usually very careful to keep their own secrets. To build the most powerful, most sophisticated, most beautiful, most reliable computer ever made. And then...

And when the engineers were finally finished, they introduced to the personal computer as provided to us practically every house.

And so many of us were people already knew how.

They didn't call the lights, or the lights, or...

They called the Macintosh.
And now we'd like to introduce it to you.
