Problem Solving

Spotlight on Teaching

Excerpts from NCTM's Standards for School Mathematics
Prekindergarten through Grade 12*

Problem solving can and should be used to help students develop fluency with specific skills. For example, consider the following problem, which is adapted from the Curriculum and Evaluation Standards for School Mathematics (NCTM 1989, p. 24):

I have pennies, nickels, and dimes in my pocket. If I take three coins out of my pocket, how much money could I have taken?

This problem leads children to adopt a trial-and-error strategy. They can also act out the problem by using real coins. Children verify that their answers meet the problem conditions. Follow-up questions can also be posed: "Is it possible for me to have 4 cents? 11 cents? Can you list all the possible amounts I can have when I pick three coins?" The last question provides a challenge for older or more mathematically sophisticated children and requires them to make an organized list, perhaps like the one shown here.

Pennies	Nickels	Dimes	Total Value
0	0	3	30
0	1	2	25
0	2	1	20
0	3	0	15
1	0	2	21

Working on this problem offers good practice in addition skills. But the important mathematical goal of this problem—helping students to think systematically about possibilities and to organize and record their thinking—need not wait until students can add fluently.
