

Self-Regulation of Pollution: The Role of Market Structure and Consumer Information

Devon A. Garvie

from Organized Interests and Self-Regulation: An Economic Approach, edited by B. Bortolotti and G. Fiorentini, 1999, 206-235, Oxford University Press.

1. Introduction

The purpose of this paper is to provide an analytical framework to assess the efficiency, distributional, and environmental consequences of voluntary codes in pollution-generating industries. In particular, we identify the conditions under which voluntary regimes are likely to be a viable alternative to mandatory regimes. Attention focusses upon the complex interaction among market structure, demand, and environmental factors including imperfect competition among pollution-generating firms and imperfect consumer knowledge of environmental consequences of production.

Voluntary codes are a form of self-regulation. Any regulatory regime — whether it be voluntary or mandatory — consists of a target and institutional arrangements which provide incentives to attain the target. Institutional arrangements include a rule (for example, a voluntary or mandatory code for emissions) and an ex-post governance structure (monitoring and sanctioning activities) which ensure compliance with the rule. A key difference between voluntary and mandatory regimes is that the choices of target and institutional arrangements are private rather than public decisions. In particular, since the choice of rule is a private decision, the rule is not backed up by the force of law and hence compliance with the rule is voluntary rather than mandatory. Voluntary codes can be chosen at either the firm or industry level.¹

Four potential sources of market failure are present in our analysis of voluntary compliance regimes: (i) imperfect competition, (ii) pollution byproducts, (iii) imperfect consumer information regarding the environmental impact of production,
