memory I had no real explanation for my compulsion to photograph myself in my mirror I scrambled through childhood pictures taken of me and then those that I began taking of myself I didn't know what I was looking for until I my first mirrored portrait I was 15 years old and wearing a white shirt and the same earrings that I wear today I was in a bathroom in the basement of my high school in Philadelphia and knowing how private I was as a teenager I am sure so one was down there but me My face is very serious in the photo I wasn't looking into the camera but at the mirror The camera was in my right hand and facing the mirror I chose to keep the camera in the frame I do not do that any more The image was blurry so I know I didn't use a tripod and the print quality was poor and stained with old high school photo chemicals This image is the first self portrait I printed myself Eight years later that photo hangs on my wall in the same cheap frame After that image I was photographed more than I can remember at any other point in my life I was popular and people were very accepting of me and I liked that I was featured in shows in high school and was a comedian who could make everyone laugh I even worked my way into being the winner of a beauty pageant photographed for magazines interviewed for television and honored as valedictorian of my undergraduate class It was at that time that I knew I was an artist I could create not just paintings and drawings but personas characters and faces for myself They worked I was comfortable in them To be in character was perfect for me I could hide anything at any moment to the untrained eye and I did it well for about 6 years In the sixth year I moved to Ohio Here I didn't need my old masks as much I have no family here and no one knows who I was back home and what I've done I can create new masks all types of masks They didn't need to have a purpose or function as the others did The mask could be anything and I could be ANYONE in my masks here I use the camera to keep track of them all
