

Ukraine, where young people protested against voter fraud in the presidential elections there.

"The Kremlin realized young people could effectively mobilize and cause a problem to the political power system so they created the Nashi to co-opt the youth movement," said Olena Nikolayenko, a political science professor at Fordham University. "Some of the pro-Putin rallies you see with young kids singing happy birthday to him are probably just from Nashi. These election show discontent across the age groups. It's a new image problem for Putin, and the 'political technologists' will have to deal with that. The problem is the Communist Party doesn't have the charismatic political leaders who could take Putin to a second round vote in March," she said. For Russian political youth groups, the best case scenario has them modernizing the Communist Party to be more like a social democratic/Chinese developmentalist hybrid. That won't happen before next year's election.

Putin's challengers are Gennady Zyuganov of the Communist Party, Sergei Mironov of A Just Russia Party, and Vladimir Zhirinovskiy of the Liberal Democratic Party. A Levada Center poll shows they don't have a chance. When asked which political party represented their political interests, United Russia got 30%. The Communists got 11%; Liberal Democrats 8% and A Just Russia received 5%.

United Russia maintains the leader in the parliament. Putin will be the next president, Arizona Senator John McCain told National Public Radio Tuesday morning.

Sunday's vote means Putin can no longer count on the elections going smoothly without proposing a serious election program. United Russia at least "looks weaker" and the three other parliamentary parties "look stronger" than they did before the election. But a Communists comeback won't take them to the presidency next year.

"The only party that has Western friendly policies is United Russia and that is one reason why people keep voting for them," said Harris. "The social liberal opposition is like the Greens or the Libertarian party in the U.S., they have no power in parliamentary politics. If they wanted to put a guy on the ballot they would need two million signatures. And then the Kremlin could just say a few of them were phoney and dismiss the whole thing."
