

I. APPROACHING CONTEMPORARY PSYCHOANALYTIC RESEARCH

PATRIZIA GIAMPIERI-DEUTSCH

"[...] the intellect and the mind are objects for scientific research in exactly the same way as any non-human things. Psychoanalysis has a special right to speak for the scientific Weltanschauung at this point [...]"

The question of a Weltanschauung, 35th Lesson of New Introductory Lectures on Psycho-Analysis (Freud 1933 a [1932], p. 159).

In the present volume current research in psychoanalysis interfaces with research in philosophy of mind and experimental sciences, especially in cognitive neuroscience. The "common ground" of these collected essays is their deeply shared interest in an emerging science of the mind. The book contains a collection of original papers categorized under three headings: Section I is devoted to the recent research on conscious and unconscious processes in psychoanalysis, philosophy of mind and experimental sciences; Section II provides an overview of current interdisciplinary research in neuroscience and psychoanalysis and Section III explores empirical research trends in contemporary psychoanalysis. Finally, some articles in this volume can also be understood as an attempt to establish a foundation of empirical and experimental research in psychoanalysis on the quite modern epistemological approach of Freud himself.

I. PSYCHOANALYSIS, PHILOSOPHY OF MIND AND EXPERIMENTAL SCIENCES

I. 1. CURRENT ANALYTIC PHILOSOPHY OF MIND AND COGNITIVE NEUROSCIENCE

Current analytic philosophy of mind attempts to outline a theory of mind as psychoanalysis did in the past and is now doing again, but despite the seeming similarity of their aims a co-operation of the two is very challenging.
