

Maintaining High Scientific Quality at Los Alamos and Lawrence Livermore National Laboratories

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

In recent years, there has been concern in Congress about security and operations management at Los Alamos National Laboratory (LANL) and Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory (LLNL). As a result of this concern and a general preference for holding regular competitions for ongoing federal contracts, Congress directed the Department of Energy (DOE) to hold open competitions in 2004-2005 for the management and operations (M&O) contracts for both LANL and LLNL, as well as for other DOE national laboratories. (Since the 1940s, the University of California has been the M&O contractor for LANL and, since its inception in 1952, for LLNL.)

The execution and accomplishments of the scientific programs¹ did not appear to be a factor in the decision to hold a competition for the M&O contracts at LANL and LLNL. In view of that, the National Nuclear Security Administration (NNSA), a semi-autonomous part of the DOE that is responsible for both laboratories, wanted to ensure that the contract competitions preserve the high-quality science and engineering currently being performed there, and so it asked the National Research Council (NRC) to do the following:

¹Throughout this report, "scientific programs" should be interpreted broadly as not only science and engineering R&D, but also any work at the laboratories that requires a combination of technical skill and creativity.
