

Assessment Considerations for Children With Mental Retardation and Developmental Disabilities

The ASHA technical report and guidelines on mental retardation and developmental disabilities (MR/DD) outline several principles for practice including two that provide considerations for the assessment of children with MR/DD (ASHA, 2005a, 2005b). They are SLPs select assessment . . . goals that have a meaningful impact on social, behavioral, emotional, academic, and vocational functioning within a variety of settings (e.g., residential, school, community, and work settings); . . . and, SLPs provide communication assessment services and supports that honor and adapt to differences in families, cultures, languages, and resources.

Comprehensive, interdisciplinary assessments for children with MR/DD offer a link to goal setting and program planning and serve to optimize intervention outcomes (Boulware, Schwartz, & McBride, 1999; National Joint Committee for the Communication Needs of Persons with Severe Disabilities, 1992; Prelock, Beatson, Bitner, Broder & Ducker, 2003; Schwartz, Boulware, McBride, & Sandall, 2001). This paper highlights the contexts for assessment and specific assessment approaches that speech-language pathologists (SLPs) might consider in their service delivery to children with MR/DD.

Assessment Contexts

Assessment should be used to define the activities that children with MR/DD can execute and the level of participation in the environments in which they engage with others. All modalities should be considered, including receptive and expressive language (verbal words, gestures, signs, AAC systems); cognitive aspects of communication; social aspects of communication; reading and writing; and adaptive behavior (ASHA, 2005b). In addition, information about communicative functions should be gathered from multiple sources in natural environments with both familiar and unfamiliar peers and adults. The contexts of home, school, and community represent specific assessment environments for increasing our understanding of the needs of children with MR/DD.

Home

SLPs need to "partner" with families, guardians, and caregivers when considering the "home" as a context for assessment (Johnson & Lindschau, 1996; Prelock, Beatson, Contompasis, & Bishop, 1999; Shelton, Jeppson, & Johnson, 1987; Vincent, 1985). The context of home may include group homes, community living arrangements, or other residential settings. Assessment approaches consider the hopes and dreams of children with MR/DD and their families; the need for short- and long-term assistance; the structure, routines, and resources currently available; and the impact of culture (Westby, 1990; Winton, 1996). Assessment in the home context also addresses the priorities of the child with MR/DD and the family, as well as the particular role a child with disabilities has within the family (ASHA, 2005b; Westby; Winton).

School

SLPs need to assess the communication abilities of children with MR/DD that promote access to the educational curriculum, literacy development, academic content, peer interaction, health and safety, adaptive function, and participation in the school community (ASHA, 2005b). School provides a unique opportunity to assess the social-communicative functioning of children with MR/DD. For example, social communication opportunities can be examined throughout the day, including making choices, requesting information, stating a need, initiating interaction, and problem solving (ASHA, 2005b). Communication partners, activities, and events that facilitate or hinder successful social communication can be identified.

Community

Because communities support children with MR/DD and their families, the community is a critical context for assessment. SLPs have a responsibility to collaborate with families and community team members (e.g., physician, vocational rehabilitation counselor, developmental services case manager) to assess needed supports and to ensure children with MR/DD have meaningful access to their community resources (e.g., youth sports, summer camps, recreation centers, libraries, etc.).
