

The Myth of the Renaissance

Peter Burke

Jacob Burckhardt defined the period in terms of two concepts, "individualism" and "modernity" ...In Renaissance Italy...this "veil first melted into air....man became a spiritual individual, and recognized himself as such..."

This idea of the Renaissance is a myth...

Burckhardt's mistake was to accept the scholars and artists of the period at their own valuation, to take this story of rebirth at its face value and to elaborate it into a book. The old formulae of the restoration of the arts and the revival of classical antiquity, he added new ones such as individualism, realism, and modernity...

...Professional historians have become dissatisfied with this version of the Renaissance....More exactly, it has been undermined by the research of medievalists in particular. Their arguments depend on innumerable points of detail, but they are of two kinds.

In the first place...so-called Renaissance men were really rather medieval. They were more traditional in their behavior, assumptions, and ideals than we tend to think- and also more traditional than they saw themselves.

In the second place, the medievalists have accumulated arguments to the effect that the Renaissance was not such a singular event as Burckhardt and his contemporaries once thought and that the term should be used in plural. There were various "renaissances" in the Middle Ages...there was a combination of literary and artistic achievements with a revival of interest in classical learning, ...and contemporaries described their age as one of restoration, rebirth, or renovation.
