

Metaphoring back in the climate crisis: Notes toward encouraging student engineer agency through metaphoring

Abstract: In this work-in-progress, I consider the impacts of generative metaphor, metaphoring, and framing on student engineers' developing positioning relative to ecological issues in engineering. I consider how engineering, as a symbolic community, is impacted by metaphors and narratives that provide frameworks by which to understand engineering's relationship to the Earth and ecology. I consider the historical framing of engineering as a "socially captive" practice and consider challenges to that framing. Finally, I consider how knowledge and comprehension of metaphors and metaphoring can inform engineering education, and in particular students' ongoing interaction with ecologically-related metaphors that frame the agency they have access to in both their education and their future professional practice.

Keywords: engineering education; generative metaphor; metaphor comprehension; symbolic communities; ecolinguistics

1 Introduction: Engineering in a crisis world

It hardly seems necessary to argue for an increased focus on ecology in an essential, ecologically-impactful practice like engineering. So, I will state it briefly and move on: we are dangerously too late to any earnest attempt to meet the climate crisis. Given that we live in what Carl Mitcham (2014) calls "an engineered world" (Why Humanities, para. 8) it is easy to locate engineering practice in both the causes and potential solutions to the climate crisis. It is in this spirit that Mitcham calls engineers "the unacknowledged legislators of the world" (Introduction, para. 2), indicating—by borrowing Percy Shelly's claim about poets—that in many ways, engineering serves a kind of authorial function in our world. It follows, then, that engineering practice must be mindful of its ecological consequences—to both avoid and reverse negative consequences—if we, as a species, are to avoid the worst of those consequences.

That process of authoring-through-design-products depends on the metaphorical framings that underlay engineering practice. Those framings are deeply rooted in cultural, economic, and colonial history and are not easily rerouted. Historically, as discussed below, engineering in the West has been "socially captive" (Goldman, 1991; Johnston et al., 1996), meaning that it has worked at the behest of the power structures that hold decision-making abilities. That is, the social captivity theory argues that engineering has traditionally followed orders from governments,
