

3 Activities for Children of Divorce and Separation

Overview

While separation and divorce are big concerns in many children's lives, sometimes kids make these things even bigger because of their lack of understanding about what to expect. Here are three quick activities that every child of divorce should know.

Activity #1

Kids need to understand that their family is changing, it is not being destroyed. For this activity, you will need a set of building blocks—about 10 or 12 blocks per child. Give the blocks to the child and ask them to build something.

Before

After they finish and have a moment to admire their creation, ask them to shuffle up the same blocks and create something different.

Next, ask the child what they liked about each of the two creations. Point out things you liked as well. Make the point that, using the same set of blocks, the child was able to make two different, interesting designs.

Now say something like this:

"Divorce is like this. Your family is not being destroyed. It is changing into something different. Similar to the way you liked things about each block design, there are things you will like about your family both before and after the divorce."

Depending on the child's individual circumstances, and where the family is at in the divorce process, you might point out things like: less fighting between parents now, enjoying things about each home and neighborhood they live in, having new step-family members to enter and enrich their lives, etc.
