

Murder by Committee: Realism and Responsibility in Ernest Hemingway's "The Butterfly and the Tank"

Jon Falsarella Dawson

"The Butterfly and the Tank," published in the December 1938 issue of Esquire, offers a powerful commentary about how people engage with the consequences of war.¹ The story displays the impact of the Spanish Civil War on Ernest Hemingway, who visited Spain four times on behalf of the North American Newspaper Alliance (NANA) and covered events that included the Siege of Madrid.² Carlos Baker observes that Hemingway "concentrated on keeping his eyes, his ears, and his literary sensibilities alert for people and situations that were in his judgment too good to waste on newspaper dispatches, that might indeed provide the material for genuine works of art" (532). "The Butterfly and the Tank" came from one such episode when a soldier killed a civilian who had sprayed the crowd at Chicote's bar with an insecticide gun.³ The scholarship on this story has emphasized the narrator's exchange with the bar manager about how to portray the homicide. For instance, Kenneth G. While this idea first emerges through their inaction during the shooting, Hemingway develops a broader sense of collective responsibility through the characters' attempts to tell Pedro's story. Through the narrator's rejection of the manager's literary framework, "The Butterfly and the Tank" conveys the responsibility of writers to truthfully present the consequences of military conflict in order to inspire the action necessary to prevent even greater tragedies in the future.

Hemingway clarifies his central theme when the narrator ponders Pedro's death, which calls attention to the characters' responsibility for this outcome. When envisioning the victim's wife asking who killed her husband, the narrator declares that "the police would never be able to tell her that even if they had the name of the man who pulled the
