Inflammasomes: Clinical and Therapeutic Implications Mario D. Cordero,Elísabet Alcocer-Gómez,2018-09-04 The inflammasome is a protein complex composed of an intracellular sensor typically a Nod like receptor NLR the precursor procaspase 1 and the adaptor ASC Inflammasome activation leads to the maturation of caspase 1 and the processing of its substrates IL 1 and IL 18 The inflammasome has been implicated numerous diseases and blockade of inflammasome derived IL 1 has beneficial effects on several of these diseases Different books have been edited about the biology of inflammasomes and about methods to study however the implication of this complex in the different diseases and pathological conditions show the need of a book about the clinical implications and therapeutic options This project will show the context where inflammasomes are being studied and the molecular implications in the medical and clinical contexts Other important topic of the inflammasomes will be the development of pharmacological inhibitors in order to improve new clinical applications In this sense we can find new drugs with inhibitory effects or old drugs with an inhibitory potential effect There is a need for re establishing the real benefits of the inflammasome inhibitions in pathological situations and the management of the different diseases where inflammasomes are implicated
