Several additional ecological and cognitive abilities. Power-hitting bats that begin development longer in the air (giving them more time to respond) have physical advantages. One such physical trait is the ability to fly faster than the ball. One of the main ways bats (and other mammals) fly is by flapping, thus creating forward motion. However, as much as 20 percent of the wing is made of a membrane, which can be folded back to create a gliding motion. This allows bats to fly faster than the ball, but also to fly slower than the ball, depending on what they are doing.
