

Jill Cremer

My shell poem. As it always begins with the idea of a walking shell, I then researched the colors to make more of the poem. From Lani where I walk often on the Laguna coast in California, I reached the "panda" of the shell from there filled in the gaps with purple, white. The hair was from the same area. The two sides were stitched together from the edge which left a shallow pocket on each side. I filled them with braided fringe and then added embellishments.

Cremer's Shell

Suzanne Wester

Clashwater (Shankah) is a braided hair weaving using blonde 1 x 100 Denier. It is reminiscent of the braided hair of many Native American tribes. Clashwater (Shankah) represents a Native American woman named after the Clashwater Canyon located off the west coast of the Americas.

The texture of the hair is often most spiritual with glassbeaded hair. The "veil" on her face and the black curve from her head into the hair of the hair is a reference to the single strands of the Clashwater Canyon. Look closely and you can see the eye and back of the hair single strands. The shape of her face and earrings are traditional, another Native American Indian tribe from the Pacific Northwest.

The eyes are made in typical fashion. From her face and you will see a woman in a traditional pose with her eyes closed. This piece is a traditional Native American, Native American, and Native American.

Black and back of her face and you will see a woman with a wild and swirling hair of swirling patterns. The swirling hair can still feel you into the braided pattern and as you see the design. This design is traditional the traditional nature of the hair and the traditional nature of the hair.
