

Mathematics in the Modern World

Week 3: English vs. Mathematics

1. Technology and Mathematics:

This article explains the interrelationship of mathematics and technology. Mathematics, together with natural sciences, was used as the basis of engineering education. The use of mathematical methods for various practical engineering tasks, technological topics, and scientific theories. Throughout history, mathematics did not develop much because it relied only upon manual work. Thus, innovations in mathematics needed efficiency and accuracy, that is why technology is used in math as well. This shows the two-way relationship between mathematics and machine. The technological principles inherent in the machine inspired new mathematical concepts. It is evidently the reciprocity in the interrelationship between math and technology. It is precisely observed in the milestone of a computer which started from counting sticks and stones until it has innovated into an abacus and into the current smartphones which made us easier to perform accurate calculations and store bulks of data.

2. Methods of Mathematical Finance:

Mathematics in the field of finance and business is widely used particularly in probability, statistics, partial differential equations, and numerical analysis. It is used in finance in researching and solving complex business problems. The problem of derivative security sellers such as pricing and hedging them, has led to the utilization of Brownian-motion-based models of asset prices. It develops contingent claim pricing and optimal consumption or investment in both complete and
