

Harrison's words are so real and are about such real things that at first they sound like something you must have heard someone say out loud, perhaps some tentatively friendly but formidable man in the kind of bar where you lay out your table stakes before you order your shot. And indeed most of us would have to be drinking or would have to be reborn as courageous poets before we could dare speak of our boredom, our love, our fear, our death, as freely as Harrison does. But then as we hear a little more, we realize how much this man knows about these things, and how artfully the wit of his speech works with the deep design of his form and the intelligence of his imagination to help us understand things, too.

—JOHN A. THOMERSON

Jim Harrison grew up in Northern Michigan and shares with that other Michigan poet, Theodore Roethlis, not only the longing to be part of the instinctual world, but also the remarkable knowledge of plant and animal life that comes only with long familiarity and close observation. This raises an incidental question: How many more poets of his kind will we see in the United States? It is a melancholy thought that Mr. Harrison may be one of the last of the species.
