

Transience and recidivism

- In Georgia, residential instability was found to be a robust predictor of reoffending; the likelihood of re-arrest increased by 25% each time a parolee moved (Meredith, Speir, Johnson, & Hull, 2003).
- Released prisoners living in temporary shelters in New York were more likely to use drugs and alcohol, to be unemployed, and to abscond from probation or parole (Nelson, Deess, & Allen, 1999).
- An unstable living arrangement was the strongest predictor ( $r = .29$ ) of parole absconding in a sample of over 4,000 parolees in California (Williams, McShane, & Dolny, 2000).
- National sample ( $n = 2,030$ ): Probationers who moved more than once during probation were almost twice as likely to have had a disciplinary hearing (Schulenberg, 2007).
