The IEEE Standards Process

Peter J. Ashenden

■ STANDARDS COMPRISE A vital part of electronic-system design flows. They facilitate exchange of design information between designers, IP vendors, service providers, and fabrication houses. Standards allow integration of tools from different vendors and an information exchange within a tool flow. They make it possible for designers to choose among competing vendors for tool solutions and reduce the risk of relying on proprietary languages and data formats.

Independent of the society structure, the IEEE Standards Association is responsible for overall coordination of standards development, approval, and dissemination. This body sets policy and procedure for developing and maintaining standards. Committees carry out important objectives of the IEEE standards development process. Objectives include ensuring open development, having a consensus of interested parties in results, and balancing the interests that the parties represent. The Standards Association Board, through its committees, ensures that standards development meets these objectives.

Ideas for new standards come from industry organizations, companies, or even individuals. In some cases, the idea might call for standardizing well-established information or practice. In other cases, the idea might advocate developing a standard to fill a void. Computer standards seem to fall into the latter category more often than standards in other industries.

Identifying a sponsor, forming a working group

The first step in the IEEE standards process is to identify a sponsor, typically a standards committee within a society that will be respon-
