

Implementation of Tobacco Cessation Quitline Practices in the United States and Canada

Jessie E. Saul, PhD, Joseph A. Bonito, PhD, Keith Provan, PhD, Erin Ruppel, PhD, and Scott J. Leischow, PhD

Tobacco-cessation quitlines have become part of the national infrastructure in the United States and Canada to provide population-based treatment to tobacco users.¹ Quitlines serve tobacco users in all 50 US states, Washington, DC, Puerto Rico, and Guam, and in all 10 provinces and 2 territories in Canada.² Annually, quitlines serve more than 400 000 tobacco users in the United States and more than 12 000 in Canada.²

There is considerable evidence that quitlines are effective.³⁻⁶ However, there are many treatment- and outreach-related practices that make up quitline operations, and their use can vary considerably by quitline. For example, variation between quitlines in the implementation of proactive counseling (where cessation counselors call tobacco users directly, rather than waiting for tobacco users to call the quitline) could affect treatment efficacy because proactive treatment is more effective than reactive treatment.^{3,5-8}

To assess the range of quitline practices available and the factors that affect implementation of those practices, we conducted a multiyear survey with US and Canadian quitlines.⁹⁻¹¹ Although 1 study has provided a descriptive overview of quitline practices, spending, and reach on the basis of data collected in 2005,¹² thus far, no studies have analyzed the process for implementation of practices by quitlines in the United States and Canada. In addition, Cummins et al. did not consider the level of evidence for quitline practices.¹² To make recommendations on specific practices that may increase quitline efficacy and reach, we examined both the variability of quitline practice implementation and the relationships between levels of evidence for individual practices and quitline reach and spending.

Building on the foundational study by Cummins et al.,¹² we based our analysis on the primary question that they asked: To what extent were different types of practices Objectives. We examined relationships between implementation of tobacco cessation practices, levels of evidence of practices, and quitline reach and spending.

Methods. In June and July 2009, a total of 176 quitline funders and providers in the United States and Canada completed a survey on quitline practices, in particular quitline-level implementation for the reported practices. From these data, we selected and categorized evidence-based and emerging quitline practices by the strength of the evidence for each practice to increase quitline efficacy and reach.

Results. The proportion of quitlines implementing each practice ranged from 3% (text messaging) to 92% (providing a multiple-call protocol). Implementation of practices showing higher levels of evidence for increasing either reach or efficacy showed moderate but significant positive correlations with both reach outcomes and spending levels. The strongest correlation was between reach outcomes and spending levels ($r=0.80$; $P<.01$).

Conclusions. The strong relationship between quitline spending and reach reinforces the need to increase quitline funding to levels commensurate with national cessation goals. (Am J Public Health. 2014;104:e98–e105. doi:10.2105/AJPH.2014.302074) implemented within and across quitlines? We expanded our inquiry by asking 2 additional questions: (1) What are the patterns of implementation of practices grouped by research evidence level? and (2) What is the relationship between implementation of practices (individually or grouped by research evidence level) and either spending levels for quitlines or actual treatment reach outcomes?

METHODS

The study team included the 5 authors, 7 additional researchers (6 from the University of Arizona and 1 from the University of British Columbia), and 3 North American Quitline Consortium (NAQC) staff members. The team also consulted extensively with an advisory work group consisting of 8 representatives of all major quitline stakeholder groups, including 4 quitline funders and administrators, 2 service providers, and 2 researchers or evaluators. The research team met weekly and conversed daily via e-mail, creating draft documents for the work group to review. The research team and the work group met monthly during the first year of the study (2009), providing feedback on instrument design and testing, review of the analysis, and interpretation of results.

Survey Materials

We selected the practices using a 2-step process. First, we conducted a literature review to identify evidence-based or “emerging” (novel, with little documented evidence but potential impact) practices for increasing either the reach or efficacy of quitlines. In addition to the peer-reviewed literature, we evaluated documents from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) that specifically referenced quitlines.^{13,14} As a second step, NAQC staff and the work group identified practices that were considered future strategies—those under consideration or being discussed by quitlines without much (or any) evidence of effectiveness for improving quit rates or reach. These were practices that many quitlines were discussing on the NAQC communitywide Listserv because of the potential for increasing the impact of quitlines by increasing either reach or efficacy.¹⁵ Table 1 provides a full list of practices included in the study for year 1.
