Green heads for the counter but Vico, his dark eyes fixed on the young woman, moves toward the pool table.

Cream? MRS. DORN

Black. GREEN

While Green orders and is served his coffee, Vico watches Beverly take a couple of shots on the pool table. His silent gaze makes her self-conscious. Her movements around the table become a sensual little ballet, every bend over the green felt accentuating the lines of her body, every stroke of the cue emphasizing the touch of her fingers. The lamp hanging over the table etches her performance like a spotlight. This same lamplight strikes only the lower part of Vico, leaving his head and shoulders in shadow, barely visible.

When Beverly has cleared the table, she turns to Vico;

BEVERLY
You got a quarter?

Without moving from the shadows, Vico hands her a quarter. She feeds the coin slot that releases the balls. After racking them, she picks up her cue and holds it out to Vico. He hesitates a moment, and then takes the cue.

Without removing his topcoat, Vico breaks and drops two balls on the break. He is a remarkably good pool player. For a long time, the only SOUNDS in the cafe are the click, thud and rattle of pool balls being struck, dropping into pockets and rolling to the return. Vico becomes totally lost in the green felt world of the table. It is Beverly's turn to watch a performance but it is a strange performance. Vico seems completely oblivious to her or anyone else.

Green comes over from the counter with his coffee cup in his hand. He, too, is amazed by Vico's skill. When one bell remains, Green puts down his cup and racks the balls again. Vico continues his run.

There is something vaguely frightening about Vico's total concentration.
