Organic Evolution Caleb Williams Saleeby,2015-06-12 Excerpt from Organic Evolution Until about one hundred years ago it was all but universally believed that the different kinds of plants and animals as men knew them had existed as such from the beginning The progeny of cows were always calves of oaks always acorns Cows and oaks had long been known and if they had not changed in two thousand years they doubtless had not changed in the six thousand years of the earth s history Not only did animal and vegetable species breed true to their kind but they did not breed among themselves or if they did the hybrid race was not perpetuated Doubtless therefore cows had always been cows and oaks oaks But indeed men had not been left to draw such an obvious inference for there was extant a divinely inspired account of the origin of species wherein it was authoritatively stated that they had been called into being by special creation To day however there triumphs after a struggle of several decades another theory which goes by the name of organic evolution About the Publisher Forgotten Books
