Abstract: The 11 species of Gonatocerus (Mymaridae) in the Hawaiian Islands are reviewed and an identification key is given. The Hawaiian fauna consists so far entirely of introduced species, apparently all from the Nearctic region, though further intensive collecting may yield additional species. All of the species occur on one of the islands, Oahu, and at least seven occur on each of Hawaii, Kauai, and Molokai. Most of the species were first collected since the 1960s. Members of the sulphuripes and ater groups are identified to species but five species in the membraciphagus and litoralis groups cannot be named for certain, pending revisions of these groups for North America. The named species are: californicus Girault, capitatus Gahan, dolichocerus Ashmead, mexicanus Perkins, ornatus Gahan, and pygmaeus Girault.

Introduction

This is the third of a series of papers treating the Mymaridae of the Hawaiian Islands. A generic key was given in the first paper together with notes on those genera containing only a few species each (Beardsley and Huber, this issue). The second paper treated the genus Anagrus (Triapitsyn and Beardsley, this issue).

Gonatocerus is one of the three largest genera of Mymaridae in the Hawaiian Islands with at least 11 species recognizable, representing the four species groups defined by Huber (1988). In contrast to Polynema, the most speciose genus of Hawaiian mymarids, Gonatocerus consists entirely of exotic species. In contrast to Anagrus, which includes several species intentionally introduced and established from Australia or Fiji (Triapitsyn and Beardsley, this issue), the Hawaiian fauna of Gonatocerus as presently known consists entirely of species originating from the Nearctic region, most apparently accidental introductions. One species, G. mexicanus, was probably introduced deliberately early in the century to control a leafhopper pest (Swezey 1916). At least six species were found at or near Waimanalo, an experimental farm surrounded by disturbed habitat. No Gonatocerus species appear to be restricted to native vegetation communities. This would be expected as all these foreign species presumably parasitize introduced hosts occurring on introduced plants.

Many exotic plants in the Hawaiian Islands, their pests, and presumably also some of their parasitoids, came from areas such as the Oriental and Australian regions. Perkins (1906) and his colleagues also deliberately imported many species of potentially beneficial insects from Australia and Fiji to control certain pests. Perkins (1912: 5-6) noted that insect species introduced from "the warmer parts of the American continent readily became established in Hawaii but native insects of California, though they had often been brought here, generally failed to establish themselves". Similarly, the little material introduced intentionally from
