

based learning, is widely preferred than traditional teaching. In this approach, the learners develop critical thinking skills and more capable of facing challenges in today's competitive world. If we look at it from the viewpoint of an engineering graduate, we find that, he or she requires more than just the theoretical knowledge of the subject. The reason behind this is the fact that engineering is such a course where conceptual knowledge and practical application of concepts, go hand in hand.

Nevertheless, if both the, problem-based learning approach as well as traditional learning approaches are taught together to the students, it would make learning easier in the field of not only engineering but also other ones in the educational curricula. The education system should mainly concentrate on imparting quality education to the students and keep introducing new ways and means to make learning a great experience for both the instructor and the learner. Whenever a new technique or method is introduced, it affects all the three i.e. the institution, the instructor and the learner. Therefore, it should be presented keeping in mind, its impact on all three of them.

In short, problem-based learning is a wise concept to go for as it opens new opportunities for both, learner and the tutor.
