A. GROSS EXAMINATION - identify

Purpose: to determine which part of the specimen should be cultured

Example:

1. sample (fluid)
 - ❖ You can now determine of concentrate first before processing
 - ❖ Determine if turbidity (no need to centrifuge)
 - ❖ Clear (centrifuge it)
2. Stool
 - ❖ Look for pus, blood itch
3. Sputum
 - ❖ Messy part
4. Tissue

Question: The tissue took in the formalin. Are we going to process still in the micro lab or were going to reject it? (The tissue is coming from an anatomical laboratory; the pathologist would like to identify what microorganism present in that tissue sample)

- No, since the sample is already fix (effect of fixation; preserved the morphology/kills the organism)
- When the sample is big chunk (Answer: yes, because you can cut and check it in the inner portion of the sample since there is no formalin in that part)

Note: whether the sample in formalin or not, in formalin if you receive a tissue sample; we need to homogenize it or they grained it so that the juice is process

B. DIRECT MICROSCOPIC EXAMINATION

- Get the sample/specimen that submitted (not yet culture)
- Cultivation of microorganism
- Identify the biochemical to be perform or enzymatic and then it identifies the microorganism

Notes: The aim of analyzing the organism that grow or identify the species of the microorganism. Once it identifies the species the next that you should do is to anti-microbial susceptibility testing.

Importance:

1. Conserved as a preliminary identification of microorganism
- Example: the physician would like the patient to receive antibiotic
 - ❖ Microscopy: the microscopy informs the physician, the gram reaction of the microorganism present in the sample and this will limit the antibiotic that would be given to the patient, so that the physician will not give a broad-spectrum antibiotic.
2. Direct visualization of the patient sample can already give a diagnosis (some other cases)
 - ➡ very common in urogenital sample and CSF for the presence of gram-negative cocci
