Servetus and Calvin - Important Epoch in the Early History of the Reformation Robert Willis, 2017-07-07 Some years ago I was led to make a study of the Life and Writings of Spinoza and took considerable pains to present the gifted Jew of Amsterdam in such fulness to the English reader as might suffice to convey a passable idea of what one of the great misunderstood and misused among the sons of men was in himself in his influence on his more immediate friends and surroundings through his presence and on the world for all time through all his works This study completed and leisure from the more active duties of professional life enlarging with increasing years I bethought me of some other among the sufferers in the holy cause of human progress as means of occupation and improvement Spinoza led I might say as matter of course to Giordano Bruno with whose writings I was familiar and who was Spinoza's master if he ever had a master But having at a former period undertaken to edit the works of Harvey for the Sydenham Society and the discovery of the circulation of the blood having become renewed matter of discussion with medical men and others labourers in the field of general literature I was turned from Bruno to Servetus as the first who proclaimed the true way in which the blood from the right reaches the left chambers of the heart by passing through the lungs and who even hinted at its further course by the arteries to the body at large Of Servetus at this time I knew little or nothing save that he had been burned as a heretic at Geneva by Calvin and of his works I had seen no more than the extract in which he describes the pulmonary circulation But meditating a revision and prospective publication of the Life of Harvey with which I had prefaced my edition of his works I went in search of further information concerning the ingenious anatomist who had not only outstripped his contemporaries but his successors by something like a century in making so important an induction as the Pulmonary Circulation Nor had I far to go The
