Method of Making Same, 1992 A nuclear fuel element for a high temperature gas nuclear reactor that has an average operating temperature in excess of 2000 degree C and a method of making such a fuel element The fuel element is characterized by having fissionable fuel material localized and stabilized within pores of a carbon or graphite member by melting the fissionable material to cause it to chemically react with the carbon walls of the pores The fissionable fuel material is further stabilized and localized within the pores of the graphite member by providing one or more coatings of pyrolytic carbon or diamond surrounding the porous graphite member so that each layer defines a successive barrier against migration of the fissionable fuel from the pores and so that the outermost layer of pyrolytic carbon or diamond forms a barrier between the fissionable material and the moderating gases used in an associated high temperature gas reactor The method of the invention provides for making such new elements either as generally spherically elements or as flexible filaments or as other relatively small sized fuel elements that are particularly suited for use in high temperature gas reactors
