

Understanding Nature And The Idea Of A Man-Made World

Reviewed by Aylla Andrianna Hamdani – 2014-8-11 00:1

Overall Summary

Within this book, Crowe tell us the difference between the natural world from the man made world, their interaction and interpretation towards architecture and the world around us. The natural world refers to the environment which has not been touched by humans, a world which has developed on their own accord through time and evolution. Where plants, animals, and other feature developed naturally in the physical world. Nowadays we view nature as natural things which implies a distinction between natural and artificial which has been changed and produced by human mind. Therefore a man-made world is a world which humans has touched and changed, created by humans and opposed by nature. An example of a man-made world would be a lake which was created by machines, our houses which was constructed by natural materials and our cities which has changed the natural environment.

Human nature think and act differently than others, we can adapt and create environment to fit our needs to be able to survive. Like for example we create shelter to protect us from the rain and wild animals, reshape the natural environment to gain easy access to food and increase number of shelter due to expansion of human growth. As we keep evolving we begin to change the natural environment into a man-made world, a reliable and much more suitable environment.

The man-made world is made by humans reflection of the natural world, nature becomes inspiration, characteristics and metaphor towards architecture. Architecture brings harmony between human habitation and the natural world through design approaches such as site, buildings, furniture and surroundings which becomes composition of a man made world. Everyone has different viewpoints on the way we approach the natural environment and the man-made environment. How we view the world depends on where we were brought up to, what we learn, our religion, culture and personal experiences. A person from a countryside will have different opinion on how they view natural resources from a city person. A countryman will appreciate their environment and food because they know what nature has given them, although a city man will not appreciate environment as much because they have not experienced it from the start.

Architecture uses nature to gain balance, ideals and beauty. A whole history could be told by a historic building, architecture becomes a tool to understand the creation of what human has constructed over time and the natural resources it used. Everything in architecture have its connection with the natural world, it could be from its materials, knowledge or metaphors. In Medieval and classical times nature becomes a starting point to construct architecture to gain perfection and balance. However after the world war, mass production become the key aspects where people needed places to live and mass houses were produced forgetting the implications to nature. After modernism and the use of vast materials which has caused harm to nature people began to recognize the damage we caused to nature.

There is always a balance between the natural world, there is life and death, day and night, plants and animals, a never ending cycle. However with the human intervention the natural world becomes unbalanced, we take too much than we can give back to nature, we destroy decreases we began to understand that it is our fault and begin to build new environments to remind us of the natural world. We are connected to nature and the man-made world is hurting not only the environment but also ourselves.

My Viewpoint

The man-made world reshape and develop the natural world to become more habitable for humans. During the process we uses our understanding on how the world around us work and our beliefs. We have changed so many things within this man made world which doesn't seem natural anymore.

The rapid expansion in human population that began after the Industrial Revolution, cities were relatively small, their impact on the natural world was limited. With the increase of population there has been wildlife extinction, deforestation, ecological footprint all caused by buildings and its surroundings. In the past the man-made world cared about the environment and only wanted to expand a little however as time passes, population increased, war begins and modernism appeared.

The man-made world changes and wanted to create better structures, technology and the increase of land use, forgetting the harm it has created to the environment. Global Warming is the consequences of what man-made world done against nature, forgetting the implications and going through with developments. It is now too late to bring back the natural environment as it is, we can only prevent further destruction.
