1900 edition Excerpt: spiritually alive and eager for things of the mind was Milton's aspiration and his ideal. He was a prophet of the movement for free national education and holding that a collection of books is the true university; a prophet of the movement for free libraries of public endowment. The writer of a good book, the teacher of youth, the guardian of a library, he viewed as members of the true clerisy of a nation more diligent for the general welfare than the hired parson, pledged to a particular set of opinions and droning out his dole on one day in seven to earn his state wages. So all the land would be soon better civilised and those who receive the free gift of education might reasonably be required not to gad far out of their own country but continue there thankful for what they had received, bestowing it on others as need arose without soaring above the rank in which they were born. Education as Milton conceived it should be not merely literary; it should be also technical: every boy should be taught an honest trade. And why should not worthy teachers of religion arise from among such cultivated craftsmen? Let Christians but know their own dignity, their liberty, their adoption, their spiritual priesthood, whereby they have all equally access to any ministerial function whenever called by their own abilities, and the Church, though they never came near commencement or university, let them but know their true prerogatives, and with liberty a new and noble vigour will be infused throughout the whole spiritual life of the country. If Milton's ideal was half a dream, it was also half a prophecy. Schools and libraries at the close of the nineteenth century in some measure realise what he anticipated in his vision. And of the Puritan and Anglican Edward Dowden, 2015-07-18 Excerpt from Puritan and Anglican Studies in Literature The Puritan writers with whom I deal are such as to render the title Puritan and Anglican not inexact, although many of the Puritan party were loyal members of the Anglican Communion. In choosing my subjects I have been influenced by two things: first, I have spoken only of writers with whom I have dwelt long and intimately; and secondly, among such writers I have spoken only of those who move me to speak through some personal interest which I feel in the men or their work. Hence, without scruple or regret, I omit many great names, being content to indulge my own likings. I have desired to remain close to my subjects; a many passages for example of what I have written. 1. Herbert and Vaughan: it is Herbert and Vaughan who are in fact the speakers, but I did not think necessary to encumber my pages with a crowd of references to scattered poems from which their thoughts and phrases have been collected.
