

LUIGI PIRANDELLO

One, No One, and One Hundred Thousand

I understand everything. But if I return to the condition of spirit I was in then, when seeing people's eyes on me, I felt as if I were being subjected to a horrible oppression, thinking that all those eyes gave me an image that surely wasn't the one I knew myself but another that I could neither know nor prevent; merely saying mad things was nothing: I felt like doing them, doing mad things: rolling over in the streets or flying along in dance-steps, winking here, sticking out my tongue and making faces there . . . And instead I walked down the street, serious, so serious. And now you, too, how marvelous! walking along so serious . . .
